DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Located on the northeast corner of Fifth and Madison streets, the Odd Fellows Hall occupies a prominent location in the center of the business and commercial section of downtown Covington, Kentucky. Covington (population 52,000, 1970 census) is located in northern Kentucky directly south across the Ohio River from Cincinnati.

Following the standard formula for the design of tall commercial buildings in the nineteenth century before the development of the steel-framed skyscraper, the building is divided vertically into three units corresponding to the base, shaft, and capital of a column, thus creating the illusion of height about a solid building mass (see photo 1).

The ground floor consists of five shops, several of which retain the original cast iron storefronts. Brick pilasters extending from the second to the third floors divide the bays and visually strengthen the building on the south and west street elevations (see photo 2). The tall, narrow windows have been boarded up. Pedimented hood molds surmount the second story windows which have panelled aprons beneath. Smooth brick surfaces serve as the architrave and frieze, and a bracketed cornice completes the building. A narrow stone beltcourse provides the only horizontal emphasis (see photo 3).

The second and third floors are now used for storage, however the auditorium on the second floor retains an elaborate plaster relief cornice. The design of the building was rather innovative for the time. Instead of center beams, iron rods support the floors and thus allow for the vast open interior spaces such as the auditorium which measures 54' x 86' with a 25 foot ceiling. The Lodge room on the third floor measures 44' x 67' with a 20 foot ceiling. Other rooms on the third floor served as a supper room, a library, and anterooms.

The nominated acreage consists of the city lot on which the building rests.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Odd Fellows Hall in downtown Covington, Kentucky, is one of the city's earliest commercial structures. Erected in 1856, its massive scale and prominent corner location make the Odd Fellows Hall one of the visual landmarks of the Madison Street business section.¹ The building is especially noteworthy in the method of construction. In order to accommodate large, unbroken interior spaces, iron tie rods were employed to support the floors. In addition to its architectural distinction, the structure is a well-known local landmark having served as the center for both civic and social activities in downtown Covington.

Covington was settled in 1801 and grew westward from the area known as "The Point" where the Licking flows into the Ohio River. The first industry was the Covington Cotton Factory established in 1828 near the Ohio River just west of "The Point." Beginning in 1840, the population of Covington grew tremendously due to large numbers of German immigrants who settled in the Covington-Cincinnati area. As the population expanded, Covington quickly developed as an urban commercial center. The present Madison Street commercial district is an eloquent visual reminder of Covington's prosperity in the second half of the nineteenth century.

Designed by Gedge and Brothers, the Odd Fellows Hall was hailed as "the most impressive and magnificent of the kind in the Kentucky."² The cornerstone was laid on 12 April 1856 and the Covington Journal of 24 October 1857 described the dedication ceremony which was preceded by a procession as "the most imposing display of the kind ever witnessed in Covington."³ The building served as the first home for the First National Bank of Covington, while other businesses on the ground floor consisted of the Post Office, a bookstore, a drugstore, and a grocery.

Originally, the second floor functioned as a large auditorium. A wide range of social and political events took place here which have resulted in public recognition of the building as a community landmark. During the Civil War, Confederate prisoners were detained in the building. Numerous literary and political figures of local, state, and national prominence delivered lectures and made public appearances in the hall. Chatauqua lectures were held in the auditorium during the 1890s. Municipal dances sponsored by the city took place on the second floor. The second floor also served as a theatre for vaudeville shows and later for movies in the early twentieth century. During the Depression, local boxing professional Joe Anderson operated a boxing arena in this space. Following Prohibition, he opened a popular nightclub, one of several to be housed in the building.

Currently, the upper floors are vacant. The present owner is in hopes that National Register listing will assist in efforts to maintain the building as a viable

HISTORIAN

One of Covington's earliest commercial structures, the 1856 Odd Fellows Hall remains a prominent element in the city's business district. It retains a high degree of exterior integrity - brick pilasters dividing upper stories, a bracketed cornice, window hoods, and most of the iron columns dividing ground-level storefronts. Building has architectural interest and a long + diverse history of service, sheltering meetings, lectures, dances, vaudeville, + movies, a boxing arena, + nightclubs as well as commercial enterprises at street level.
