Joe Robinson was born in Mason County, Kentucky in 1854. (A)

His master, Gus Margill, was very kind to him and all his slaves. He owned a large farm and raised every kind of vegetation. He always gave his slaves plenty to eat. They never had to steal food. He said his slaves had worked hard to permit him to have plenty, therefore they should have their share. (A)

Joe, his mother, a brother, and a sister were all on the same plantation. They were never sold, lived with the same master until they were set free. (A)

Joe's father was owned by Rube Black, who was very cruel to his slaves, beat them severely for the least offense. One day he tried to beat Joe's father, who was a large, strong man; he resisted his master and tried to kill him. After that he never tried to whip him again. However, at the first opportunity, Rube sold him. (A)

The Robinson family learned the father had been sold to someone down in Louisiana. They never heard from, or of him, again. (A)

Mr. Robinson lives with his wife; he receives a pension, which he said was barely enough for them to live on, and hoped it would be increased. (B)

He attends one of the W.P.A. classes, trying to learn to read and write. (B)

They have two children who live in Chicago. (B)
